Shorty Thompson: The Gamblin' Kid

Born in New Mexico in 1859, Billy "Shorty" Thompson earned his nickname from his diminutive stature. Despite his small size, Shorty possessed a fearless nature and a keen intellect. As a young man, he became renowned for his uncanny skill at gambling, particularly in the high-stakes world of faro and poker.

Shorty often emerged victorious from these encounters, amassing a substantial fortune.

However, Shorty's life was not without its share of danger. He frequently found himself embroiled in disputes and confrontations. In one notorious incident, he shot and killed a man in Tombstone, Arizona, after a heated argument. Despite being charged with murder, Shorty was acquitted, proving his unwavering determination to survive in the treacherous environment of the Wild West.

Jubal Stone: The Outlaw Tamer

Born in Tennessee in 1843, George "Jubal" Stone was a man of immense strength and courage. He inherited his skills as a hunter and tracker from his Native American grandmother, which served him well in his later adventures.

Stone initially gained notoriety as an outlaw. After killing a lawman in a self-defense situation, he went on the run, pursued by a relentless posse. However, during his time as a fugitive, he realized the futility of his life of crime.

A chance encounter with the legendary lawman Wyatt Earp changed Stone's destiny. Earp recognized his potential for good and persuaded him to turn himself in. Stone agreed, eventually becoming a deputy U.S. Marshal.

As a law enforcement officer, Stone became known as a fearless pursuer of outlaws. He apprehended numerous criminals, including the infamous
