- Dr. John Sinclair, the family physician: A respected man with a keen eye for detail, he was the one who discovered Sir Reginald's body. Did he witness something that could lead to the killer?

As the detectives delved deeper into the investigation, they uncovered a web of deceit and treachery. Fingerprints on a secret letter revealed a forbidden romance between Lady Hartigan and the artist. Financial records hinted at Henry Hartigan's mounting debts and his desperate need for money. Eleanor Hartigan's diary exposed her unrequited love for her tutor, fueling speculation about her motives.

With each piece of evidence that emerged, the list of suspects narrowed. The police zeroed in on the most likely culprit: Lady Hartigan. Her affair, combined with her financial difficulties and the discovery of a hidden firearm, pointed towards her complicity in the murder.

Yet, as the case was brought to trial, a shocking twist occurred. A witness came forward with damning testimony against a previously overlooked suspect: Dr. Sinclair. It was revealed that he had been secretly in love with Lady Hartigan and that he had murdered Sir Reginald in a fit of jealousy.

The trial of Dr. Sinclair sent shockwaves through Victorian society. The beloved family physician had been a wolf in sheep's clothing, his motive driven by unrequited love and a twisted desire for revenge. Lady Hartigan was cleared of all charges, but her reputation was forever tarnished.
